Barbara Bowers is a professor in the School of Nursing at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. She teaches courses in care of older adults, systems development, interviewing and research methods. Dr. Bowers has been involved in the development and evaluation of systems providing care to older and disabled adults for over 20 years. She has conducted extensive research in consumer centered services and systems, care and service quality from the perspective of the consumer as well as the provider, and the implementation of technology to support care planning. Dr. Bowers has published widely on care quality in community based systems and nursing homes, on educating future practitioners to care for older adults across settings, on how public policy influences service delivery, on the integration of health care and supportive services, and on the integration of disability and aging service systems. Dr. Bowers has served on many national expert panels reviewing oversight and monitoring of care, educational requirements for health service workers, development of nursing leadership in long term care, and the use of advanced practice nurses in care of older adults.
